

HOUSE OF COMMONS
LONDON SW1A 0AA

September 2018.

Dear Constituent,

A Response to the Kweku Adoboli Campaign

I entirely respect the deeply considered nature of the view you hold, and hope setting out a little of the background will prove useful, even if I cannot convince you to reconsider your position.

The UK Borders Act 2007 outlines that a deportation order must be made in respect of a foreign criminal sentenced to imprisonment for a period of one year or more, unless their case meets an exception set out by Parliament.

This man is the biggest rogue trader in UK history. Unpopular as banks may be in some quarters, losing $2.25bn through unauthorised trading is not a 'victimless' crime. Mr Adoboli was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. By any measure, this is a lengthy sentence for fraud and reflects not only the seriousness of the crime, but also the man's attitude while committing it-and his attitude afterwards.

The decision to deport Mr Adoboli has been upheld at successive court appeals spanning four years and the case was not found to meet any of the exceptions in the Act. I have been assured that all legal representations from Mr Adoboli were considered ahead of a decision to deport him and he has had opportunities to make further representations as part of the appeal process, which is independent of any politician and, indeed, the Home Office. I understand that a final judicial review has been granted in this case and I will be following this process with interest.

Yours sincerely,
